Travelling in France:

France has an efficient and comfortable railway network, in particular owing to the high speed train lines. It is therefore easy to travel using this mode of transport, from one town to another and even long distance: a 4 hour train journey separates Marseille, at the southern-most point of France, from Lille, in the most northern point of the country (approximately 1000 km).

Many national and international airlines in every French city allow you to reach any destination in the world easily.

The motorway and road infrastructures are also of excellent quality, with, in particular, a network of picturesque B-roads, which allows those who take the trouble to discover all the charms of rural France.

It is not a problem to use your national driving licence in France. Speed limits are 45 or 50 km/hr in built-up areas, 90 km/hr on roads and 130 km/hr on motorways. A second-hand car in good condition rarely costs less than 3000 euros, but you can rent a recent vehicle anywhere.
